

Economic diplomacy as a part of national and international economic security in today's world economic thought

O.I. Horbachuk, Postgraduate of International Economics

«KROK» University

sandor61@ukr.net

Research Methodology: Applying the general scientific methods of cognition, an analytical survey of modern Western theories on the mutual influence of the political (diplomatic) and economic components in the national and international economic security was done.

Results: Based on these theories made some conclusions, generalizations and assumptions. Specifically: in today's global economic system intensive international economic relations is a guarantee of stability and sustained development of the world economy, and therefore the basis of national and international economic security. And the level and intensity of these relationships are provided by economic diplomacy, which has a range of the inherent tools and mechanisms.

Novelty: Revealed one of the characteristic features of modern global world economy, which can be summarized in three theses: 1. National States within any mega union will continue to be key actors in international economic relations, 2. Asymmetry will be the determining factor in the nature of these relationships 3. Economic diplomacy as a component of economic security will be formative principle of geopolitics and geoeconomics in the XXI century.

Practical significance: Research and theoretical developments of foreign scientists in the field of economic diplomacy and economic security, as specific conclusions and generalizations made on the basis of that developments can be useful in the practical work of state authorities at all levels, businesses, social movements and organizations related to international economic activity, and international organizations in the development of modern principles of international economic cooperation.